BRITAIN'S TOP CYCLISTS COULD ABANDON MAJORCA

- Shortage of Winter flights could mean that Team Sky move their training camp from Alcudia to the South of France.
- Pollensa business owner, Tolo Llompart who is a close friend of Sir Bradley Wiggins, says that the local authorities should do more to promote cycling tourism on the island and ensure that there are more Winter flights.

BA flies positive flag for Scottish split

● The head of the International Airlines Group, that owns British Airways, said yesterday that Scottish independence could be good for business, providing a boost to the campaign that wants Scotland to split from the United Kingdom.

After a flurry of companies this week raised potential risks from independence, IAG Chief Executive Willie Walsh said he was not worried about British Airways' prospects if Scotland voted on 18 Sept. to end a 307-year tie with England.

IAG is the first major company to sound a positive note for a breakaway Scotland.

"If anything, it will be slightly positive, since we believe (an independent Scotland) will abolish air passenger duty because they recognise the huge impact that tax has on their economy," Walsh told BBC television.
