Britain says more deadly drone strikes possible, despite criticism

BRITAIN will not hesitate to carry out more deadly drone strikes against militants in Syria planning attacks on the United Kingdom, defence minister Michael Fallon said yesterday, as he defended the killing of a British Islamic State fighter.

Prime Minister Cameron told parliament on Monday that he had approved an air strike against a vehicle carrying a British jihadist in Syria who he said was plotting attacks against Britain.

The attack killed Reyaad Khan from Cardiff and two other Islamic State fighters including another Briton, Ruhul Amin.

"We wouldn't hesitate to do it again. If we know there's an armed attack likely, if we know who's involved in it, we have to do something about it," Fallon told BBC Radio.

Human rights groups and some lawyers criticised the decision to authorise the strike, which was carried out in August, saying the government needed to give details about what evidence it had that attacks were planned and to disclose the legal basis for the attack.
