Trump invites May to visit "as soon as possible"

● Trump set out his close and personal connections with, and warmth for Britain. "He said he was confident that the special relationship would go from strength to strength."

● May and Trump agreed that the U.S. and British relationship was "very important and very special and building on this would be a main priority."

London.—U.S. president-elect Donald Trump invited Theresa May to visit him as soon as possible during their first telephone call since his election victory, the British prime minister's office said yesterday.

May and Trump agreed that the U.S.-British relationship was "very important and very special, and that building on this would be a priority for them both", a statement said.

"President-elect Trump set out his close and personal connections with, and warmth for, the UK. He said he was confident that the special relationship would go from strength to strength," it added.

May, who was appointed prime minister shortly after Britain voted to leave the EU in June, also told Trump that she hoped to strengthen bilateral trade and investment with the United States as the country leaves the bloc.
