Election pleases British in Spain

● The election outcome gives Britons in Spain hope for “a less dogmatic Brexit and a less aggressive stance by the U.K.” in the negotiations.

MAY FIGHTS FOR SURVIVAL

● The EuroCitizens association in Spain, which demands continuing rights after Brexit for British citizens there and for Spanish nationals in the U.K., says the election outcome gives it hope for “a less dogmatic Brexit and a less aggressive stance by the U.K.” in the negotiations.

Spanish prime minister Mariano Rajoy has said in a message to May he wants to deepen ties with the U.K., especially their cooperation in the fight against terror attacks, and help ensure an “orderly” departure for the U.K. from the European Union.

However, Rajoy could perhaps find himself dealing with a new leader should Theresa May be replaced which was one of the top stories yesterday.

London will not be cowed by militants

● London will not be cowed by militants who have killed 35 people in three separate attacks on the United Kingdom but police will ask for more resources to tackle the threat from marauding assailants, London police chief Cressida Dick said yesterday. Dick said she understood that people were concerned about security after attacks but that the British capital was a safe city that would not be intimidated.
