Voter confidence in UK handling of Brexit ebbs away - ORB poll

● A record majority of Britons disapprove of Prime Minister Theresa May's handling of Brexit talks and they are increasingly sceptical that leaving the EU will make the country better off, an opinion poll showed yesterday.

ORB International said 66 percent of people disapproved of the government's conduct of the negotiations, up from 64 percent last month.

The poll also showed only 27 percent were confident that May will get the right deal, compared with 47 percent who were not confident. Trust in May's handling of Brexit has evaporated since she gambled away her parliamentary majority in an election in June.

With only 17 months left until Britain is due to exit the European Union, the lack of clear progress in the negotiations has raised fears of an abrupt departure with no transition that businesses say they need.

For the first time, more Britons disagreed that Brexit will help the economy than agreed, ORB said. "There is no sign that the prime minister is beginning to turn things around when it comes to Brexit," ORB said in a statement.
