Outgoing British ambassador to Spain could get top European Union post

Madrid.—The outgoing British ambassador to Spain, Simon Manley, could be appointed the new British ambassador to the European Union, the The Times reported yesterday. Manley, who was a highly successful British ambassador to Spain, visited Majorca on numerous occasions and presided over three events which were organised by the Bulletin.

If Manley gets the top

European Union job it will be a boost for British expatriates in Spain because he is well aware of the problems they face especially post-Brexit.

Manley lengthened his stay in Spain because of all the uncertainty regarding Brexit and to his credit, he alongside his team in the Consular network, organised a whole series of events to keep British expats informed about Brexit.

Simon Manley arrives at Bulletin event.

Spanish court rules singer Julio Iglesias is father of 43-year old man

Madrid.—A Spanish court ruled yesterday that singer Julio Iglesias was the father of a 43-year old man, resolving a paternity dispute that had lasted three decades after the singer refused to take a DNA test.

Javier Sanchez-Santos was born in 1976 to Portuguese dancer Maria Edite Santos. The ruling that he is the son of Iglesias can still be appealed.

Iglesias, 75, has sold more than 300 million records in 14 languages, making him the best-selling Latin artist ever.

He turned to singing after a car accident in 1963 that ended his burgeoning career as a soccer player.

He has eight other children. Three were born out of his marriage to Isabel Preysler and five with his wife Miranda Rijnsburger.
