Spain airports to buy screening machines that allow liquids in bags

● British authorities have ordered airport operators to install the high-technology machines by next year.

Madrid—Spanish airport operator Aena plans to buy new machines that will allow passengers to keep computers and liquids inside carry-on luggage when going through X-ray checkpoints.

The new luggage-screening equipment, as well as other biometric and security systems for all its airports, will cost the company about 1.17 billion euros, Aena said this week.

“The new X-ray technology will generate

3D images,” the company said, adding that electronic devices and liquids will no longer have to be taken out of the luggage for screening.

Aena expects to install the machines in all its terminals by 2028. The new technology might be deployed in some airports as early as late 2023, El Pais reported.

In Britain, authorities have ordered airport operators to install such machines by 2024.
